"I think it gives consumers more reason to place trust in what they see on these review sites, certainly," Levy tells CNBC Make It.

Levy notes that, in the past, e-commerce companies and review sites have sometimes taken matters into their own hands when looking to squash fake reviews. Amazon itself has filed numerous lawsuits in recent years against sellers who post false reviews, as well as third-party companies that sell the service of posting fake reviews. Amazon estimated last year that "less than 1 percent of reviews are inauthentic" on the site.

"We welcome the FTC's work in this area," an Amazon spokesperson told

The Verge. "Amazon invests significant resources to protect the integrity of reviews," but "even one inauthentic review is one too many."
