“The Lord of the Rings: The Rings of Power” showrunners J.D. Payne (l) Tj T* BT

Amazon’s new $715 million “Lord of the Rings” series is the most expensive TV show of all time, but it was created by two showrunners with hardly any Hollywood credits between them.

The duo’s pitch for the show - which focused on a period in Middle-earth thousands of years before the events of the “Lord of the Rings” films - inadvertently aligned with the vision that J.R.R. Tolkien’s grandson Simon Tolkien had for a series, according to the Journal.

“Simon Tolkien had an idea of the show he wanted,” a source familiar with the show’s production told the Journal, “and they went and pitched it without knowing it.”

The younger Tolkien, who controls his grandfather’s estate, was further impressed by Payne speaking Elvish and quoting the late author in their initial conversations.

Amazon says “The Rings of Power” premiere drew 25 million viewers around the world during its first 24 hours, though it is unclear what metric Amazon uses to measure views.

“The Rings of Power” releases episodes every Thursday at 9 p.m. ET on Prime Video.
